1 Introduction

The PM profiles currently used for surface coating operations are PM222 (oil-based paint application) and PM223 (water-based paint application) [1]. These two profiles were made based on tests done at a paint spray booth using oil-based enamel and water-based enamel, respectively, in 1979 [2]. PM222 shows that 55% of the PM from oil-based painting operations is elemental carbon (EC) and PM223 also exhibits that 50% of the PM from water-based painting operations is EC. According to the paint composition and the spraying process, the two EC contents are suspiciously high. The original test report reveals that over half of the PM mass is total carbon (volatile carbon) instead of EC [2]. Therefore, these two painting profiles need to be updated.

In 1998, Cass's group directly measured the particle-phase emissions from paint spray coating operations [3]. Based on their source testing data, two new PM profiles are developed in this work:

- PM2201: Oil-based surface coating operations
- PM2202: Water-based surface coating operations

The new profile PM2201 will replace the current profile PM222 for the categories of oil-based painting operations for all years; and the new profile PM2202 will replace the current profile PM223 for the categories of water-based painting operations for all years.

It should be noted that the existing profiles PM220 (coating material evaporation) and PM200 (evaporation) were both assumed the same as PM222 (the PM profile for oil-based coating operations) [1]. Since the profile for oil-based coating is now being updated in this work, the profiles PM220 and PM200 need to be updated as well. They are assumed the same as the new oil-based coating operation profile PM2201.

- PM2203: Coating material evaporation
- PM2204: Evaporation

The new profile PM2203 will replace the current profile PM220 for the categories of coating material evaporation for all years; and the new profile PM2204 will replace the current profile PM200 for its associated categories for all years.

2 Methodology

During the tests conducted by Cass's group in 1998, PM emissions were sampled at the outlet of the exhaust vent of a licensed paint spray booth located in the Los Angeles area [3]. Paint particle overspray from the operation that exited the booth's emissions control system was accompanied by ambient air which was pulled into the paint booth by the ventilation system exhaust fan. Particles with diameters less than 1.8 μm passed through the cyclone and were collected by a series of sampling trains operated in parallel. The oil-based paint used in the study was an oil-based prime (Z-prime, Zehrun Corp., Portland, OR). The primer was mixed with lacquer thinner (3:1 primer: lacquer thinner) and was sprayed with a high-volume low-pressure air gun. A total of 1.9 liters of the diluted primer was sprayed by a professional painter over a period of 40 minutes. The water-based paint used in the study was Superma Latex low gloss enamel (Dunn-Edwards Corp., Los Angeles, CA). The water-based paint was mixed with water (3:2 paint: water) and was sprayed with the same air gun as used for the oil-based paint. Over a period of 40 minutes 2.4 liters of diluted paint was sprayed. A complete PM profile has two indispensable components, size profile and chemical speciation profile. The development of these two components is described in this section.

2.1 Size profiles

In the tests, only fine particles were collected after the 1.8 μm cyclone and no more information about the PM size distribution was obtained. Hence, the size profiles of PM2201 and PM2202 are assumed the same as the ones of PM222 and PM223 [1] for oil-based and water-based painting, respectively. PM2203 and PM2204 have the same the same size profile as PM2201.

2.2 Chemical speciation profiles

The chemical composition of the fine particles was calculated based on the emission rates in the study report [3]. Organic carbon (OC) and titanium are the largest contributors to the fine particles from both the water-based and oil-based paint spraying operations. The weight fraction of non-carbon organic matter (NCOM) was calculated by multiplying a factor of 0.4 to the weight fraction of OC. The rest of the weight fraction that closes the mass balance of the fine particle emissions was taken as the species of 'other'. The species of 'other' captures the missing mass, including the oxygen associated with the common crustal elements.

3 Results and Discussion

The PM size profiles (i.e., the weight fractions of $\text{PM}_{10}/\text{TPM}$ and $\text{PM}_{2.5}/\text{TPM}$) and chemical speciation profiles for coating/painting/evaporation operations are summarized in Appendix 1. Since particle size-specific chemical compositions were not analyzed in the source tests, a homogeneous chemical composition is assumed for all PM size ranges. That is, the chemical composition of TPM, PM_{10} and $\text{PM}_{2.5}$ are assumed to be the same for each profile.

For oil-based painting operations, PM2201 shows that 96% of the coat spraying PM is PM₁₀, and 92.5% is PM_{2.5} (Appendix 1a). The particles contain 38.5% of titanium and 22.4% of OC. There is only 1.0% of EC in the speciation profile, which is much lower than the 55% EC in the current PM222. These apply to PM2203 and PM2204 as well.

Profile PM2202 indicates that water-based spraying particles are larger than the oil-based particles because 68% of the particles are PM₁₀ and 62% of the particles are PM_{2.5} (Appendix 1b). In the water-based spraying particles, OC is the most abundance species (35.3%) and titanium is second to it (12.5%). The particles contain only 0.4% of EC, and it is much lower than the 50% EC presented in the current PM223.

4 Estimated Impacts of the Profile Update on the Emission Inventory

The new profile PM2201 will replace the current profile PM222 for the categories associated with oil-based painting operations for all years. The related SCCs/EICs are summarized in the Appendix 2a. Calendar year 2014 was randomly picked for estimating the impacts of profile update. However, there is no PM_{2.5} emissions of oil-based coating categories reported for the 2014 based on CEPAM [4] data (California 2016 Ozone SIP Baseline Emission Projection, Version 1.00). Therefore, there is no further discussion on the impact of the replacement of PM222 with PM2201 on emissions in this document.

The new profile PM2202 will replace the current profile PM223 for the categories associated with water-based painting operations for all years. The related SCCs/EICs are summarized in the Appendix 2b. Based on CEPAM [4] data (California 2016 Ozone SIP Baseline Emission Projection, Version 1.00), the 2014 statewide annual average PM_{2.5} emissions of water-based coating categories are 0.017 tons/day. It is about 0.004% of the grand total emissions (natural resources are excluded). Because the dramatically reduced EC fraction in PM2202, the use of the new profile will cause 98.82% decrease in EC emissions. Meanwhile, the emissions of OC will increase from 0 to 0.0060 tons/day due to the profile update (Table 1).

Table 1. Emission changes resulted from new water-based coating PM profile update (2014)

State Annual Ave. Emissions	Using Current PM223 (tons/day)	Using New PM2202 (tons/day)	Change
			Emissions (tons/day)	Percentage
EC	0.0085	0.000068	-0.0084	-98.82%
OC	0	0.0060	0.0060	N/A

The new profile PM2203 will replace the current profile PM220 for the categories of coating material evaporation for all years. The related SCCs/EICs are summarized in the Appendix 2c. Based on CEPAM [4] data (California 2016 Ozone SIP Baseline Emission Projection, Version 1.00), the 2014 statewide annual average PM_{2.5} emissions of PM2203 related categories are 1.57 tons/day. Because the dramatically reduced EC fraction in PM2203, the use of the new profile will cause 97.67% decrease in EC emissions. However, the OC emissions will increase from 0 to 0.35 tons/day due to the profile update (Table 2).

Table 2. Emission changes resulted from new coating material evaporation PM profile update (2014)

			Emissions (tons/day)	Percentage
EC	0.86	0.016	-0.84	-97.67%
OC	0	0.35	0.35	N/A

The new profile PM2204 will replace the current profile PM200 for the associated categories for all years. The related SCCs/EICs are summarized in the Appendix 2d and most of these categories do not have PM emissions. Based on CEPAM [4] data (California 2016 Ozone SIP Baseline Emission Projection, Version 1.00), the 2014 statewide annual average PM_{2.5} emissions of PM2204 related categories are 0.94 tons/day. The use of the new profile will cause 98.08% decrease in EC emissions. However, the OC emissions will increase from 0 to 0.21 tons/day due to the profile update (Table 3).

Table 3. Emission changes resulted from new evaporation PM profile update (2014)

State Annual Ave. Emissions	Using Current PM200 (tons/day)	Using New PM2204 (tons/day)	Change
			Emissions (tons/day)	Percentage
EC	0.52	0.0094	-0.51	-98.08%
OC	0	0.21	0.21	N/A
