Background:

In 1999, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (U.S. EPA) promulgated a regional haze regulation that calls for states to establish goals and emission reduction strategies for improving visibility in 156 mandatory Class I national parks and wilderness areas. California has 29 of these national parks and wilderness areas, including Yosemite National Park, Redwood National Park, and Joshua Tree National Park. The regulation provides an option for western states to comply by implementing the recommendations adopted by the Grand Canyon Visibility Transport Commission in 1996. The Western Regional Air Partnership (WRAP) is the successor to the Grand Canyon Commission.

On May 9, 2000, California joined the WRAP, a consensus organization of states, tribes, and federal agencies. The first major issue before the WRAP is a regional sulfur dioxide trading market for stationary sources in lieu of Best Available Retrofit Technology (BART). The WRAP must submit the trading program to U.S. EPA by October 2000. California sources are not expected to be affected because they already comply with the federal BART requirement. There are also additional longer term planning requirements under the regional haze regulation. The staff will provide an update on these requirements and their timeframes.
